A "decline in morale in the teaching and learning of Setswana at all levels has been observed over the past decade. Many language teachers have opted to teach English rather than Setswana and students' performance in Setswana has consistently deteriorated over time. This study investigated the status of Setswana in education as perceived by policy makers in the Ministry of Education, teachers in two primary schools, and in society as observed in six social domains and through interviews with members of the National Setswana Language Council" (quoted from the abstract).

- The author aims to answer "whether Sheng, a language spoken in the Eastlands area of Nairobi, Kenya, is a mixed language (incorporating Swahili, English and local vernaculars). The study focuses on the lexicon and morphosyntax, but social factors are examined as well. Three broad research questions are addressed: (1) Does Sheng have a core vocabulary separate from that of Swahili? (2) How do the system morphemes of Sheng compare with those of Swahili? And (3) in what manner does Sheng provide its speakers a new identity?". The answer seems to indicate yes, it is a mixed language.

"Sheng gives young people the wherewithal to question and challenge the ideologies and identities that attempt to define them. Sheng also signifies the construction of a linguistic third space between the global, represented by a transnational African diasporic culture, and the local, represented by tradition". The thesis looks specifically at Sheng use among rap musicians and manambas (i.e. young men working on/in Matatus). "Manambas are the master innovators of Sheng ... While rappers negotiate between tradition and modernity, Manambas stand in between the global and the local" (quoted from the abstract).

Investigates "judgments of language samples produced by bilingual speakers. In the first study, listeners judged whether two language samples produced by bilingual speakers were spoken in the same language or in two different languages. Four bilingual African talkers recorded short passages in Swahili and in their home language (Akan, Haya, Kikuyu, and Luhya) ... Undergraduate students enrolled in an introduction to linguistics class with no previous experience with African languages served as listeners, judging each test item as containing a same language or different language pair. Overall, listeners made accurate judgments over 70 percent of the time" (quoted from abstract).

London: John Murray. Pp lxxxii, 498.
- Often referred to as "Report on the Tuckey expedition". Captain Tuckey and his staff "collected some useful vocabularies of the 'Malemba' and 'Embomma' languages, covering some 500 English words. These vocabularies represented the dialects of the Cabinda district and Boma respectively" (Doke 1959:5). They had an idea of the unity of the (then known) Bantu languages. "These men went there with the Bantu theory in their minds, though the comprehensive word 'Bantu' was not then suggested. They refer to the existence of this one great family across the southern third of the continent in their contributions to the 'Narratives...'" (Johnston 1919:3). There also exist two slightly abridged American editions (lxxxix+[85]-410 p.), one published by Kirk & Mercein in New York, and another one by W.B. Gilley in New York, both dated 1818. Don't know if there are any differences between them.

- Yāqūt al-Rūmī. 1212/24. Mu'jam al-buldān = The dictionary of countries.
Includes an early recording of the name for Zanzibar, i.e. Langūjah (Doke 1960:27). Yāqūt al-Rūmī's Mu'jam al-buldān is a geographical dictionary with place names arranged alphabetically. The author began writing it in 1212. "For entries on the Sahara and the Sudan Yāqūt quotes the tenth-century Ibn Hawqal and the eleventh century al-Bakrī. But he also borrowed (without acknowledgement) from Ibn al-Faqīh ... But by far the most important quotations are those from al-'Azīzī, the lost work of al-Muhallabī" (Levtzion & Hopkins 1981:167).

Discusses a Kikuyu tradition "concerning the occupation of their country by two pre-Bantu peoples". Apparently, there were first some "cannibal dwarfs" called Maithoachiana. These were later replaced by a people referred to as Gumba.

As the unsophisticated habitually regard all Bantu tribes as one ... Dr Bruwer has wisely emphasized the basic similarity of the various tribal cultures and mentioned differences only where they are particularly significant."

- Corsali wrote a 'lettera' (dated January 6th, 1515) to the Medici family while on a Portuguese vessel on his way to the Indian Ocean via southern Africa. He makes a brief mention about different languages being spoken on Africa's western and eastern coasts, respectively. Corsali wrote several letters, some of which later appeared in various editions of Ramusio's Delle navigationi et viaggi. They were also translated into several European languages, e.g. English in 1555, German in 1576.

- Discusses ancient Indonesian presence on the East African mainland. Purports, for instance, that the ancient Zanj were an Indonesian people. Includes chapters "Who were the Zanj?" (p. 68-75), "Who are the Malagasy?" (p. 88-107) as well as several chapters on how, according to the author, Indonesians reached West Africa by rounding the Cape. In short, the book ascribes an Indonesian origin/influence to many things in Africa, like the Great Zimbabwe, Nigerian art & sculptures, etc.

- The first known Bantu publication, a Kikongo catechism. Iorge is the author, Cardoso the translator. The word «Christaã», a misprint for «Christã», appears as such on the title page (Doke 1959:49). "The constant use of the circumflex accent upon penultimate vowels indicates the recognition of the stress. But perhaps the most remarkable thing about Cardoso's work ... is that his word-division seems almost perfectly conjunctive. Despite the fact that the Kongo is written interlineally beneath the Portuguese, Cardoso's word-division is practically unaffected by that of the Portuguese - unconsciously he has recorded the words as they were spoken" (Doke 1959:50).

- Date and authorship highly uncertain. The Pate Chronicle is a Swahili document relating the history of the town of Pate, from the 13th century till the late 19th century. Several Swahili versions seem to exist. They were originally based on oral traditions. All(?) known manuscripts seem to date from early 1900s.

- Sample includes 43 Mbundu-speakers and one Kongo-speaker (p. 441). "Correspondence and phylogeographic analyses show that Angolan mtDNAs mirror the west and central African gene pools, with a minor eastern African component" (p. 444). Moreover, "the correspondence analysis displayed a clear separation between west and east Africa, but place the southwest region in an intermediate position between west, east and southeast Africa. This suggests that the western and eastern Bantu expansions were not independent events, but that they most likely joined below the tropical forest zone and then dispersed through the southern areas of Africa ... Alternatively, the Bantu people may have reached both southwestern and southeastern Africa from a common origin elsewhere. This could explain some common shared lineages, but it is still hard to reconcile with the historical and linguistic data" (p. 445).

- Details wanting. Advocates the idea that the most of Africa, from Great Zimbabwe to Ancient Egypt, was once a single thriving empire which has been fighting against an Arab invasion and destruction of Black culture throughout history, a process that is still evident in the southern Sudan. The book "is, in many of its aspects, as thoroughly fantastic a piece of historical mythmaking as any of Afrocentrism's more obviously slapdash productions. Above all, Williams presents a view of history more relentlessly racialized than almost anything else in the genre" (Howe 1998:219).
